

FROM A FOREIGN VIEWPOINT.

Freeman's Journal (Dublin).

Those who a few weeks ago were prophesying Mr. Taft's election as "a dead sure thing" are beginning to realize that Mr. Bryan, after all, has his chances. True, he has been twice defeated, defeated principally by the defection of sections of his own party who disliked his program. But, then, it is remembered that he polled a million votes more than the orthodox Democrat, Judge Parker, whose nomination the Democrats of Wall street imposed upon the convention of 1904. Many things have since.

Nowhere has wealth organized itself so skillfully to take toll of the earnings and creations of the workers. From behind its tariff wall, erected professedly in the interest of the wage earner, it operates more successfully and ruthlessly than ever mediaeval baron from behind his castle fosse. The meat of the world's ranch, the fruit of the greatest fruit-producing country, the oil of the wells that light half the civilized world, the iron and coal that America possesses in incalculable quantities, have been as successfully monopolized as the imported wines and silks in the trade in which the court favorites of the Tudors and Stuarts found their dower. The coin of the wage-earner is clipped whenever he proceeds to barter with the trusts.

The victorious republicans four years ago, eight years ago, were to end all this. They were to restrain the trusts. They were to revise the tariff.

Mr. Taft's committee is now engaged in passing the hat to "predatory wealth." The situation gives the key to the Bryan campaign. President Roosevelt must feel flattered. He has nominated Mr. Taft as his successor, and the opposition to Mr. Taft is to be based on the argument that he is not strong enough to carry out the Roosevelt policy, that the executant of that policy must be found in the democratic camp. There is a good deal of truth in the contention. President Roosevelt stole a good deal of Mr. Bryan's thunder. He was never able "to catch the Nebraska man bathing, but he got at his wardrobe and filched some of his most characteristic garments." He could not make them the fashion in the republican camp, and it is pretty clear that if they are to be worn successfully at Washington they must be exhibited there on the person of their original wearer.

MINING APPLICATION.

No. 684.
